b. The deduction made from the amount of a bill of exchange or promissory note, by one who gives value for it before it is due, this deduction being calculated at a defined rate per cent. for the time the document has to run; practically, the interest charged by a banker or bill-discounter for advancing the value of a bill before it is due.

This is the common form in which banks and discount-houses advance money to persons engaged in commerce; the banker or discounter having thus purchased the bill at a discount keeps it till maturity, when he realizes the full amount. In practice, discount is calculated as the interest on the amount of the bill for the time it has to run; this is more than what arithmeticians call the true discount, which is reckoned as interest on the present worth (i.e. that sum which if invested at the given rate for the given time would amount to the face value).

Econ.* iii. vi. (1876) 361 The value of money is said to be represented by the Bank-rate of discount. 1881 J. BROOK-SMITH Arith. (ed. 6) 223 With bankers and bill-discounters, discount is the interest of the sum specified, whereas, properly speaking, it is the interest of the present worth of that sum. And as the present worth of a sum due at a future time is less than the sum itself, the true discount is less than the banker's or mercantile discount; and therefore the banker obtains a small advantage.

[Mentioned in 1256 as the English or Anglo-French name for Fr. les mals jours: whence it appears to be OF. dis mal = L. dies mali evil days, unlucky days. It was thus originally a substantive of collective meaning; when 'day' was added, making 'dismal days', (cf. 'summer days', 'winter days'), its attributive use passed into an adjective, and its original application being obscured, it was finally before 1600 extended from day, days, to be a general attribute. See Note at end of this article.]

A. sb. (The original use.)

+ 1. The dies mali, evil, unlucky, or unpropitious days, of the mediæval calendar, called also dies Egyptiaci, 'Egyptian daies' (see EGYPTIAN 1 b); hence, by extension, Evil days (generally), days of disaster, gloom, or depression, the days of old age. The dies mali were Jan. 1, 25; Feb. 4, 26; March 1, 28; April 20, 25; May 3, 25; June 10, 16; July 13, 22; Aug. 1, 30; Sept. 3, 21; Oct. 3, 22; Nov. 5, 28; Dec. 7, 22. They are said to have been called 'Egyptian days' because first discovered or computed by Egyptian astrologers; though some mediæval writers connected them with the plagues of ancient Egypt (cf. the Chaucer quat. 1369, where the word appears to be treated as OF. dis mal, ten evils, or plagues, flage; see Prof. Skeat's note, Chaucer I. 493); some, still more fancifully, associated them with the gloom of 'Egyptian' darkness.

[Note. As to the identity of dismal with OF. (=AF.) dis mal—L. dies mali, see Professor Skeat in Trans. Philol. Soc. 1888, p. 2. Already in 1617, Minshcu (whose own memory doubtless recalled the time when dismal was used only to qualify days) derived it from L. dies mali, an evil and unhappy time. Early corroborative evidence comes from OF. and Icelandic sources. (1) The Anglo-French Art de Kalender of Rauf de Linham, 1236 (MSS., at Glasgow, Oxford, Cambridge; extracts printed by M. Paul Meyer in his official Rapport on Documents Manuscrits de l'ancienne littérature de la France, Paris 1871, pp. 127-9), has a passage of sixtyn lines on the Dies mali, beginning 'Ore dirai des jours denielz, Que vous dismal (Bodley MS. dismol) appellez' [Now shall I tell of the forbidden days, Which you call dismal], and further on 'Dismal les appellent plousours, C'est est a dire les mals jours' [Dismal several call them, That is to say the evil days]. Here dismal is given as the equivalent of 'mals jours', evil days. (2) A short Icelandic treatise in a Copenhagen MS. (Arna Magnæan 350, written 1363, ff. 148 a), begins 'Her greinir um dismalla daga. Tveir ero þeir dagar i huerum manadi er at bokmalji kallaz dies mali. enn þat þydz illir dagar' [Here tells of the dismalle days. There are two days in every month that in the book-language (Latin) are called dies mali, and that is interpreted 'evil days']. The word dismal is not Norse, and must have been learned from England before 1363. In dismalla daga, it is probably an adj. accus. pl., but may be a sb. gen. pl., 'days of the dismals'. Both the AF. and the Icelandic treatises give a list of the dies mal or dies mali, identical with that given by various mediæval writers, and computable by the mnemonic dismalle given by Dr. Cange s.v. Dies Egyptiaci: see sense 1 above.]

1. Essentially different or diverse in kind; dissimilar, unlike, distinct. In Logic, used of things or concepts having no obvious common ground or genus in which they are correlated. Hence distinguished from contrary, since contrary things are at least correlated in pairs, e.g. good and bad.
Also distinguished from disjunct, since disjunct concepts may all be reduced to a common kind.

Disparatus appears first in Cicero De Inv. Rhet. 23. 42, applied to the mere separation expressed by sapere, non sapere, or A is not B, as against the opposition of hoc and cold, life and death; it is used by Boethius, De Syll. Hyp.

(ed. Bas.) 608, to denote things which are only different, without any conflict of contrariety (tantum diversa, nulla contrarietate pugnantia). It reappears in 14-15th c. with the school of Occam, e.g. in Rud. Strobus and Paulus Venetus, and is retained in modern transformations of the scholastic logic. According to Ueberweg Logic § 53, disparate conceptions are those which do not fall within the extent of the same higher, or at least of the same next higher conception. (Prof. W. Wallace.)

I. 224 Notions co-ordinated in the whole of comprehension, are, in respect of the discriminating characters, different without any similarity. They are thus, pro tanto, absolutely different; and, accordingly, in propriety are called Dis- parate Notions, (notiones disparate). On the other hand, notions co-ordinated in the quantity or whole of extension
.. are only relatively different (or diverse); and, in logical language, are properly called Disjunct or Discrete Notions.

Dispart (dispært), sb. [Derivation uncertain.

There appears to be no related name in any other language. An obvious suggestion is that the appellation was derived from DISPART v.1, from the mode of ascertaining the dispart, by disparting (dividing in two) the difference between the two diameters'. But it is to be observed that the term with its own verb (DISPART v.2) appears earlier than any known occurrence of DISPART v.1, and that the particular sense 'divide into parts' is not known to us before 1629.]

1. The difference between the semi-diameter of a gun at the base ring and at the swell of the muzzle, which must be allowed for in taking aim.

1588 LUCAR Appendix to Tartaglia's Colloq. 4 Every Gunner before he shoots must trulic disparte his Peece, or give allowance for the disparte. 1644 NYE Gunnery i. A. GRIFFITHS Artill. Man. (1862) 50 The Angle of dispart is the number of degrees the axis of the bore would point above the object aimed at, when laid by the surface of the gun. 1867 SMYTH Sailor's Word-bk., Dispart, or Throw of the Shot. An allowance for the dispart is...necessary in determining the commencement of the graduations on the tangent scale, by which the required elevation is given to the gun.

2. concr. A sight-mark placed on the muzzle of a gun, to make the line of sight parallel to the axis of the bore.

1578 W. BOURNE Invent. or Devises xxxi. 24 You must glue your leuell lustly vpon the thicker side of the peece, that is to say, the mettall of the breech of the peece, and the dispart, and the marke, to be all three vpon one right line by the sight of your eye. 1621 FLORIO, Tirare di puntaria. II. vi. 95 Dispart. is a piece of a small stick or Wyre, set perpendicularly upon the Muzzle-Ring of any Gun, of such length that the top of it may be equal (in height) to the upper part of the Base Ring. 1753 CHAMBERS Cycl. Supp. s.v. Take the two diameters of the base-ring, and of the place where the Dispart is to stand, and divide the difference...into two equal parts, one of which will be the length of the Dispart, which is set on the gun with wax or pitch, or fastened there with a piece of twine or marlin. 1836 MARRVAT Midsh. Easy xviii, Gunnery, sir, is a science—we have our own disparts and our lines of sight—our windage, and our parabolas, and projectile forces. 1861 W. 3. attrib. Dispart patch, a notched piece of metal on the muzzle in place of the dispart in sense 2; dispart-sight (see quots.).

1867 SMYTH Sailor's Word-bk., Dispart-sight, a gun-sight fixed on the top of the second reinforce-ring—about the middle of the piece—for point-blank or horizontal firing, to eliminate the difference of the diameters between the breech and the mouth of the cannon. 1884 F. II. The action of administering, ordering, or managing; the system by which things are administered.

[This group of senses originates in the L. use of dispensatio to render Gr. οἰκονομία in N. T. and patristic writers. The latter is used in 1 Cor. ix. 17, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below); but in Eph. i. 10, iii. 9, for 'a method or system of administration' (specifically that which involved the Incarnation). From this latter arose various theological uses: (1) Tertullian (Adv. Praxean ii, iii, iv) uses dispensatio=οἰκονομία to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i.e. a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes. This is known as an economical as distinguished from an essential Trinity; in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATORY, and essential.) (2) It was applied to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumpti corporis d. susceptæ carnis, or simply dispensatio) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August. Serm. 264 § 5). (3) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratiæ in opposition to the Law or system of works (August. Ep. 82 § 20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salutis nostræ (August. Serm. 237 § 1). Hence, in the Latin version of Irenæus, Christ is called dispensator paternæ gratiæ (iv. 20. 7). (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertull. Adv. Marc. vi. 12, Hil. Pict. De Trin. ix. 66, xi. 13); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption.]

4. The orderly administration of things committed to one's charge; the function or office of administrator or steward; stewardship. arch.

6. Theol. A religious order or system, conceived as divinely instituted, or as a stage in a progressive revelation, expressly adapted to the needs of a particular nation or period of time, as the patriarchal, Mosaic (or Jewish) dispensation, the Christian dispensation; also, the age or period during which such system has prevailed; = ECONOMY b.

An extension of the patristic use of the word as applied to the evangelical system based on the Incarnation (see note under II above); the patriarchal and Mosaic 'dispensations' being conceived as prophetic of the Christian, all being one in substance though differing in form. This use became common in the theology of the 17th c.

II. from med. L. dispensare in ecclies. use.

[In later med. L. (by 1000 or earlier) dispensare was used absol. or intrans. (agere dispensatorie or dispensative), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (οικονομος), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively, especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which, according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons; thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc. The chief constructions were dispensare in tali casu, circa jus, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp. cum aliquo (ut possit), i. e. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc.) (Prof. F. W. Maitland, L.L.D.)

These intrans. uses passed into English, esp. dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sense: see branch III. By elision of the preposition or other processes, the verb has also become trans. in the sense 'to grant dispensation to, for, or from.' Transitive senses are found also in French from 15th c.]

3. The action of converting any substance or constituent of a substance into vapour by means of heat, and of again condensing this by refrigeration into the liquid form, by means of an alembic, retort and receiver, or a still and refrigerator; the extraction of the spirit, essence, or essential oil of any substance by the evaporation and condensation of its liquid solution; and, in a more generalized sense, the operation of separating by means of fire, and in closed vessels, the volatile parts of any substance from the fixed parts, in order to the collection of the products.

As shown by the etymology, the original application is to substances of which the distillates are condensed drop by drop into the liquid form; whether for the purpose of extracting the more volatile part of a substance, or of concentrating or purifying a volatile substance such as water by freeing it from matter held in suspension or solution. When no more heat is applied than just suffice to cause the liquid to pass over in drops, the process is called cold distillation. Dry or destructive distillation, the decomposition of a substance by strong heat in a retort, and the collection of the volatile matters evolved, as in the destructive distillation of coal in gas-making. Fractional distillation, the separation of two or more volatile liquids having different boiling-points, so that they pass over at different temperatures and can be collected separately, the more volatile first, and the less volatile in order afterwards. Distillation by descent (per descensum), in Old Chem., the name given to a method in which the fire was applied above, and the distillate drawn off beneath (see DESCENT 1 d). In opposition to this, the ordinary method was called distillation by ascent (per ascensum).

Pref.* 4 A commodious division and distribution of his matter. 1856 EMERSON Eng. Transl. Relig. Wks. (Bohn) II. 96 The distribution of land into parishes.

b. concr. A division.

1829 SOUTHEY O. Newman vii. Omitting The minor distributions (which are many and barbarous all) suffice it to name these... the Pequods first; The Narhagansets [etc.].

4. Logic. †a. In the earlier English writers used for what is now called DIVISION, i.e. the logical division of a genus (a logical whole) into the several species included under it; less properly, the partition of a whole into the integral or constituent parts contained in it. Obs.

1588 FRANCIS Lamiere Log. i. xiii. 56 b, A distribution is when the whole is distributed into his partes. 1628 T. SPENCER Logic 143 When we say, a man hath two parts, soule and bodie: Living Creatures are reasonable, and unreasonable, then we make a distribution. 1698 NORRIS Pract. Disc. (1709) IV. 194 Then he would have given us a full distribution of immortality, to which all the instances of it might be reduced. 1725 WATTS Logic i. vi. § 10 The word distribution is most properly used, when we distinguish an universal whole into several kinds of species.

b. More recently, after Scholastic usage of Latin distribuire, distributio: The application of a term to each and all of the several individual instances included in its denotation or extension; the acceptance of a term in a general sense including every individual to which it is applicable.

Said of a term qualified explicitly or implicitly by such marks of universality (signa universalitatis) as all, each, every, any, etc.; the one simple common term being treated as 'distributed' over all its significates; e.g. in every man, the term man is spread out over, or dispersed among, this, that, and every other individual man.

This use of distributio (which turns on the question discussed in Plato, Parm. 130 seqq.), first appears in the Schoolmen of the 13th cent., as Shyreswood, and especially Petrus Hispanus (1226-1277), of whose Summulae the 7th chapter deals with the properties of terms, including Distributio, as an appendix to the exposition of the Organon, and with special reference to the solution of sophisms. The term apparently came into English logic through the medium of Aldrich: see DISTRIBUTE v. 6.

(The speculation in Latham's Johnson s. v. Distributed is wholly gratuitous, and ignores the history of the word.)

15250 Petrus Hisp. Summulae vii. 5. 1 Distributio est multiplicatio termini communis per signum universale facta, ut cum dicitur 'omnis homo', iste terminus 'homo' distribuitur sive confunditur pro quolibet suo inferiori. 1827 WHALEY Logic i. § 5 'All food', or every kind of food, are expressions which imply the distribution of the term 'food'; 'some food' would imply its non-distribution. 1849 MANSIELD Aldrich's Logic iii. § 3. 4 note, Distribution is not an Aristotelian term. It forms part of what the Schoolmen call parva logica; a kind of appendix to analyses of the Organon; containing matters, some evolved from Aristotle, others complete innovations... The syllogistic rules concerning distribution are of course implied in Aristotle's account of each figure, though not enumerated separately, as common to all. 1864 BOWEN Logic v. 126 The distribution of the Subject depends upon the Quantity of the Judgment. 1887 FOWLER Elem. Deduct. Logic (ed. 91v.) 34 The distribution or non-distribution of an attributive, as 'human', 'red', etc., follows that of the corresponding common term, 'human being', 'red thing', etc.

5. Rhet. (See quots.)

1553 T. WILSON Rhet. (1567) 95a. The ME. evidence favours this; but in modern use, both forms occur in nearly all parts of the country, with various differentiation of meaning. Generally, ditch is a hollow channel or deep furrow, wet or dry, but in some parts (see sense 4) it is an embankment or raised fence; usually dike or dyke is a bank or wall, but in many parts it is a wide and deep channel for running water. The existence of dick or deck in this sense in Kent, Sussex, and other southern counties, is remarkable. The use of dike, dyke, for a sea-wall or embankment in the eastern counties, may possibly have been introduced from Holland: cf. the title DIKE-GRAVE.]

Dive (dōiv), sb. [f. DIVE v.]

1. The act of diving; a darting plunge into or through water or the like. lit. and fig.

The Amateur Swimming Association distinguishes between a dive and a plunge. The latter is defined as a standing dive made head-first from a firm take-off, free from spring. The plunger does not add any further impetus, but allows himself to progress till all forward motion ceases, when he raises his face above water. A dive may be running, from a spring-board, and with propulsion added on reaching the water.

Dj- is not an English combination, but is sometimes put to represent the Arabic letter ج jim, = English j (dj), in Arabic, Turkish, or Berber words, which have come to us through a French channel, or are spelt in imitation of French orthography: c.g. djebel, a mountain or hill, djerid or djereed, a javelin, djin, genii or familiar spirits, djubbah, an outer garment. So far as these come under the scope of this Dictionary, they will be found under J; for djowr, an infidel, see GIAOUR.

Do (dō), v. Forms and inflexions: see below. [A common WGer. strong vb. (wanting in Gothic and Norse): OE. dōn = OFris. dūa, OS. dōn, duon, dōan, duan (MDu. & Du. doen, MLG. & LG. dōn, duon), OHG. tōn, tān, tuon, tuuan, tuen (MHG. tuon, Ger. thun, tun); Pa. t., OE. dyde, pl. dēdon, dēdon, dydon = OFris. dede, pl. dēden, OS. dēda, pl. dēdan, dēdan (MDu. dēde, Du. deed, pl. dēden, MLG. & LG. dēde, pl. dēden), OHG. tēta, pl. tātunt (MHG. tete, tāte, pl. tāten, Ger. that, tat, pl. thaten, taten); Pa. pple., OE. gedōn, gedēn = OFris. dōn, OS. gidōn, dōn, dān, dān, Odū, dān (MDu. gedān, Du. gedaan), OHG. (ge)dēn, Ger. gethan, getan; OTent. types dōn, dēda, dēno; dōno, from verbal stem dō = dō (appearing also in DEED, DOOM, -DOM), the Germanic representative of the Aryan verb stem dō = dō, to place, put, set, lay, in Skr. dā, OPers. dā, Gr. thē (pres. θήναι, deriv. sb. θῆναι a penalty imposed), L. dēre in *adde*re to put away, condēre to put together, addēre to lay down, OSlav. děti, děyati, Lith. dėti, Lett. dēt to pnt, lay.

The vocalization of the Germanic vb., esp. the present stem dō, beside the Gr. thē and Slav. lithm, has been variously explained (see e.g. Streitberg Urgem. Gramm. 329). The pret. dēda is generally held to be a reduplicated form corresponding to Skr. dadhān = orig. **dhedhō*. The 1st p. sing. pres. indic. had originally the ue of primitive verbs in -ui, Skr. mi, Gr. mi, Lat. mi, viz. OE. dōn (later dō), OS. dōn (later dōn), OHG. tōn, tuon (later tuon). This verb is considered by many philologists to be the source of the formative suffix of the pa. t. of weak verbs in the Germanic languages, including Norse and Gothic; in the latter the plural endings -dōn, -dēdū, -dātun, are the forms which the pl. of the pret. dēda would have in Gothic.

OE. deviates from the other WGer. langs. in the past dyde, for OS. dēda, OHG. tēta; the y is now generally explained as a special OE. representation of an Indo-germanic weak vowel. Thence the pl. dydon; the plural corresp. to OS. dādun, modG. thaten, was Anglian dēdon (also dēdon, in Cædmon, etc.). In ME. dyde, dyden were represented by dide, en (ii) midl. & north. diden, dide, now did; but dēden (with a sing. dēde derived from it like modG. that from pl. thaten) came down in some dialects to 15th c. In the pres. indl. the 2nd and 3rd pers. sing. in OE. had umlaut, dēst, dēst, dēst, and these forms survived in s.w. till the 15th c.; but in Northumbrian had, without umlaut, dōst, dōst, dōst, and in ME. the forms dōst, dōst (dōst are found in north. & midl. from the 12th c.). The pple. in OE. is known only with the prefix ge, which in ME. remained in the south as ge, i. (Forms with ge are found also in the pa. t., and occasionally other parts, which, how ever, are more properly referred to a derivative vb. OE. gedōn, ME. ido, ydo). The final -n of the pple. was generally dropped in the south in ME., esp. in the forms ydo, ido, whence the ado (or ido) of modern s.w. dialects.]

In 1768 they were incorporated under the name of 'the College of Doctors of Laws [of Oxford and Cambridge] exercising in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts'. In the buildings of Doctors' Commons were held five courts, viz. the Court of Arches, Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Court of Faculties or Dispensations, Consistory Court, and High Court of Admiralty; the business included all matters of ecclesiastical law, prosecutions for heresy, divorce suits, licences for marriage, testamentary affairs, Admiralty and Prize cases, etc. The Society was dissolved in 1858 and the buildings were taken down in 1867. Literary references to Doctors' Commons in later times usually refer to the registration or probate of wills, to marriage licences, or to proceedings for divorce.

1. A word conventionally used (? after Dryden) as an attribute of old oaks (rarely other trees); app. originally meaning: Having lost the top or branches, esp. through age and decay; hence, remaining as a decayed stump. Johnson explained it as 'Overgrown with dodder; covered with supererect plants'; and this explanation, which was manifestly erroneous, since neither dodder nor any plant like it grows upon trees, has been repeated in the dictionaries, and has influenced literary usage, in which there is often a vague notion of some kind of parasitical accretion accompanying or causing decay.

1. The days about the time of the heliacal rising of the Dog-star; noted from ancient times as the hottest and most unwholesome period of the year.

They have been variously calculated, as depending on the greater dog-star (Sirius) or the lesser dog-star (Procyon); on the heliacal, or (by some in modern times) the cosmical rising of either of these (both of which also differ in different latitudes); and as preceding, following, or both preceding and following, one of these epochs; and their duration has been variously reckoned at from 30 to 54 days. To the latitude of Greenwich, the cosmical rising of Procyon now takes place about July 27, that of Sirius about Aug. 11; in Mediterranean latitudes, the former is somewhat later, the latter earlier. The heliacal rising is some days later than the cosmical; and all the phenomena now take place later in the year than in ancient times, owing to the precession of the equinoxes. Thus very different dates have been assigned for the dog-days, their beginning ranging from July 3 to Aug. 15. In current almanacs they are said to begin July 3 and end Aug. 11 (i.e. to be the 40 days preceding the cosmical rising of Sirius).

The name (Gr. ῥῆτινα κυνότα, Lat. dies caniculares) arose from the pernicious qualities of the season being attributed to the 'influence' of the Dog-star; but it has long been popularly associated with the belief that at this season dogs are most apt to run mad; see CANICULAR 1, quot. 1601.

The dōl, dole form survived in English till the 16th c., and its normal representative in modern English is dool; but the word became to a great extent obsolete by 1600, and some of its modern revivers have preferred the ME. spelling dole. It has always been retained in Sc., where it is now regularly dōl, dūl, variously spelt dool, duil, dul; dule also occurred in English from 14th to 16th c., and is used in preference to dol or dool by some modern poets. In addition to these derivatives from OF., the forms duyel, duyl, deul, duel, ducil, imitating later French types, occur from Caxton onwards.]

Given by Legonidec 1821 as Breton = 'monument in form of an altar or table'; and usually explained as f. Breton dol = taol, L. tabula, table + mean, men stone. But the Breton compound of these words would be taolvan or tholvan, and the d and m of dolmen are not thus satisfactorily accounted for. Borslase, Antiq. Cornwall (1754) called these structures cromlech, but gave tolmen, lit. 'hole of stone', as the current Cornish name for those enormous blocks found in Cornwall and Scilly naturally poised upon two supporting points, so as to leave a 'hole' or aperture beneath, through which a man or beast may pass. There is reason to think that this is the word inexactly reproduced by Latour d'Auvergne as dolmen, and misapplied by him and succeeding French archaeologists to the cromlech.]
